The latter procedure wouldlead to a strong "foreign accent", with very unfavorableconsequences at the level of the function of identification andrepresentativeness of the foreign language.Students will be able to understand (oral and writtencomprehension), to speak (verbal interaction and speechproduction), to write in French (written production of the CEFRlevel A2), as well as to master the phonetic transcription of text(CEFR level A2-B1) in French. They will be able to master thecorrect articulation, intonation, accent and rhythm of the Frenchphonological system. |              |                          |              |  |  |  |

| Coursedescription                                  | A brief theoretical description of the French phonetic system and the articulatorybasis of the French language compared to those of the Croatian language; adoption ofnew distinctive characteristics of voices (vocal and consonantal nasality, rounding offront vowels). Emphasis is placed on the practical acquisition of French phonetics bydeveloping the capacity for auditory identification of sounds and their phonetictranscription, as well as the distinction of larger pronunciation units.Basic orthoepic rules with particular reference to the distribution of double-timbralvowels, nasal vowels, rounded front vowels, unstable e and its function, semi-vowels,syllable structure and larger prosodic units. |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |              |                          |              |  |  |  |
